capturing emotion in photographs

Photographing animals and people presents some unique challenges and no one formula works for every situation. From shelter pets to black tie portraiture I've spent the last 20 years trying to capture and communicate the emotion that is cocooned inside all living beings. Join me on Friday February 11th at a meeting of the Westchester Photographic Society when I will talk about the joys, frustrations, laughter and tears and ultimately the incredible thrill of capturing that "decisive moment" (I'll also talk about how I get some of the shots)

Bio

Quirky, eccentric and also a bit intense, I have always been involved in the arts. Creativity keeps me balanced and content. I need a creative outlet just as I need air and water. I've been working as a part time photographer for 20 years. Photographing shelter animals (dogs, cats, horses, bunnies, etc) has been a specialty that is close to my heart.

Taking photos of people and families both with and without pets is an incredible challenge and a great way to satisfy my creative itch. To me there is no better feeling than being trusted to capture the heart and soul of other living beings. When people are excited by the images I've made for them, and those images can evoke emotions, well, that's just the proverbial icing on the most tasty cake.
