Minimaslist Photography

Topic

Minimalist photography is a powerful medium that aims to convey the “soul” or essence of a subject, whether the subject is a person, an object, a place, or even a feeling. It involves stripping away everything in the image that doesn’t contribute to the essential vision of the photographer.

Any camera, even a phone, can be used to create minimalist photographs. The more important part of the equation is seeing deeply into the subject. This is something that can be practiced even without a camera; it’s a matter of tuning in to a scene or subject in a very focused way. We must slow down and notice shapes, lines, light, form, and especially our own feelings in the moment, and then distill the composition down. The result is often emotionally evocative.

Bio

Judy Hancock-Holland is a photographic artist whose work focuses on themes such as aging, healing, femininity, death and dying, peace and passion, and spirituality and sensuality. Her experience of aging and widowhood and her sense of the sacredness of Creation inform how she sees and portrays her simple subjects. A lifelong learner and educator, . Hancock Holland has won a number of medals from the Canadian Association for Photographic Arts, been published in PhotoNews Canada, and was awarded honourable mentions in the 15th and 16th Julia Margaret Cameron international photography competitions and 2021 Minimalist Photography Awards, and was shortlisted in the 2021 Closeup Photographer of the Year international competition. Her YouTube tutorials have garnered over 150,000 views.
